...ing to Set Out Azaleas This Spring?
...is a good season to plant ... before you plant, make sure you know the requirements for azaleas. Azaleas require acid soil, shade and moisture.

A sandy loam containing a good amount of organic matter is the most desirable soil type for azaleas because the soil is generally porous enough to provide ample aeration for the roots. Oak leaves, well rotted sawdust or peat are valuable ingredients to add to the soil as they help to improve the physical character of the soil.

Chemicals like sulphur or aluminum sulphate may be adder when the soil is being prepared to help acidify the soil. These materials should be used to supplement and not to take the place of organic matter. Powdered sulfur may be applied at the rate of 1 to 1½ pounds per 100 square feet. Apply aluminum sulphate at the rate of 2 to 4 pounds per 100 square feet.

Plant A Tree

Early spring is an ideal time for planting most shade trees. The holes for planting should be dug large enough to allow the roots to be spread out without bending them. If the soil is of poor quality, discard it and bring in fertile soil to put around the roots. Be careful about using fertilizer at the time of planting, because it is very easy to burn the plant roots. Wait until the next season, after the tree becomes established, before using a commercial fertilizer.

Many trees are lost each year because home owners fail to stake their new trees properly. Trees that are not staked will often grow crooked. Use a 2 x 2 inch wood stake or metal pipe to hold the tree in place while it grows. It is best to place the stake in the hole before filling in the earth. The stake may damage the roots if it is placed after the tree is planted. Set the stake in the ground about two feet. It should be high enough to support the tree. When one stake is used, place it on the side of the prevailing wind. After planting the tree, thread a wire through a piece of garden hose, tie this around the tree stake to hold the tree in place.

Another method to support newly planted trees is to use guy wires or cables. These should slope from about half way up the trunk to the ground at an angle of about 45 degrees. The upper ends of the wire are attached with lag screws or by threading the guy wire through a piece of garden hose to prevent damaging the bark. The lower ends of the wires are anchored to stakes driven deeply into the soil. Generally, three wires or cables are usually placed around a large tree. Do not use these guy wires in situations where it is possible for people to stumble over them at night.

Wrapping the tree trunk will retard evaporation of moisture from the bark. It protects the bark from the hot rays of the sun and often will prevent sun scald. Wrapping also prevents wood borers from attacking the tree. Burlap is a good material to use for wrapping the tree trunk. Special paper is also available for wrapping tree trunks and generally can be obtained at most nurseries and lawn and garden centers.

Add Some Hay To Silage Rations For Top Production

(Editor's note: This is the third and last of a series of releases dealing with forage harvesting and feeding, a timely topic on Virginia dairy farms).

You can usually count on good production and small live - weight gains when high quality grass silage is fed us the sole forage to dairy cows. But Dr. W. A. Hardison, dairy scientist at VPI, says slightly better performance can be expected when a little hay is added to an all-silage ration.

Studies show that grass silage as the only source of forage will support rather high levels of milk production. In one study where grass silage was fed as the only forage to dairy cows for three consecutive years during the winter months, there were no off-feed conditions, and the animals stayed healthy and produced satisfactorily.

Recent studies indicate that milking cows should not be shifted abruptly from pasture to corn silage and hay to hay-crop silage. Animals so treated needed 4 to 6 weeks to start eating silage at the maximum rate, and milk production usually dropped 10% to 20%.

Although good production may result when silage is the only forage fed, some work indicates that a small amount of hay in the diet is advantageous. For instance, in one study, where cows ate 4 pounds of hay daily along with all the silage they would eat, daily milk production averaged about 1 pound higher per cow than where an all-silage diet was fed.

In contrast, a recent report in which rations were fed varying from all silage to silage plus 1 pound of hay per 100 pounds of body weight, showed that the all-silage ration produced just as much milk and maintained weight better than did the rations containing varying amounts of hay, even though the consumption of dry matter and total digestible nutrients was lower with the rations high in silage.

In fact, body weight gains of the cows tended to decrease as the proportion of hay in the ration increased. This, plus the fact that fewer pounds of total digestible nutrients were needed to produce 100 pounds of milk in the case of the higher silage rations, indicated that the nutrients supplied by the silage were more efficiently used than those supplied by the hay.

Other workers found that milk production was not materially influenced by the proportions of silage and hay in the ration.

In instances where an all-silage ration has been compared with an all-hay ration for milk production, the cows have done just as well if not better on silage as on hay. This has occurred in spite of the fact that dry matter intake was usually higher on the all-hay rations.

The maintenance of body weight has not been consistent. In some studies, body weight was not maintained as well on all-silage rations as where hay was the only forage fed. In other studies, the silage rations were just as efficient as the hay rations.
